This has begun to change with the advent of modern antimicrobials, as reported by several studies that attribute the mortality of severe sepsis and septic shock to the side effects of antimicrobials, rather than the infection itself \[[@B9]\]. Unfortunately, antibiotic consumption continued to rise during the same period \[[@B8]\]. It is not known whether the higher mortality of our T2D group could be explained by the better co-morbid conditions of the patients in this group, although this is a possibility given that the T2D group had more dyslipidaemia and cerebrovascular diseases, and a higher rate of APLS. On the other hand, all the patients in the T2D group were on insulin therapy, which has been shown to be a strong independent risk factor for hypoglycaemia \[[@B10]\]. Other important risk factors for hypoglycaemia, which we did not record in our study, include osmotic diuretics, angiotensin converting enzyme inhibitors and angiotensin II receptor blockers \[[@B10],[@B11]\]. A recent study by Kim and colleagues \[[@B12]\] concluded that hypoglycaemia was one of the leading causes of death in ICU patients, and that these patients were at high risk for hypoglycaemic episodes. Therefore, it is possible that the lower hypoglycaemic rate recorded in this study could have influenced the worse outcomes in the T2D group. We found that insulin utilization was significantly associated with the development of hypoglycaemia in the ICU, and that the incidence was directly proportional to the duration of insulin utilization. The duration of insulin administration is now recognized as a strong predictor for the development of hypoglycaemia in all critically ill patients, and may be related to the severity of the underlying illness \[[@B11]\]. In a randomized controlled trial of patients with severe sepsis and multi-organ failure, patients were randomized to receive a traditional anti-inflammatory regimen with continuous veno-venous hemofiltration (CVVH) or a low-dose corticosteroid regimen with CVVH \[[@B
